

Sinclair Broadcasting's decision to force their stations to air an anti-Kerry documentary days before the election is a clear example of the dangers of media consolidation.

Sinclair uses the public airwaves free of charge, and is obligated by law to serve the public interest. But when large companies control the airwaves, we get more of what's good for the bottom line and less of what we need for our democracy. Instead of something produced at "News Central" far away, it's more important that we see real people from our own communities and more substantive news about issues that matter.

If Sinclair is going to broadcast this, something pro-Kerry needs to be broadcast as well. Of something equally as anti-Bush. At the very least, the stations in question should have the option to not air the documentary. For a corporation to steal public airwaves to show an obvious piece of propaganda is one more step to the American people losing their freedom to choose.

Sinclair's actions show why we need to strengthen media ownership rules, not weaken them. They show why the license renewal process needs to involve more than a returned postcard. Thank you.
